Re: Application for Business Analyst, HR Systems Support

The Bank of Canada's mandate work, monetary policy, the financial system, currency, depends on something much less visible: institutional operations smooth enough that the people doing that work never have to think about them. HR systems support sits exactly there. When an access request stalls or a process breaks, someone's actual work stops. I have spent the last two years being the person who keeps that from happening, and the chance to do it inside an institution I respect as much as the Bank is why this posting caught me.

At IRCC's Operations Support Centre I administer GCMS access for staff at over 60 Visa Application Centres and Missions worldwide: account provisioning, permission changes, and urgent system issues, triaged from a national intake against urgency and capacity, with every action logged. It is service delivery with an audit trail, across time zones, for users who cannot do their jobs until I have done mine. That is, in different clothes, the HR systems support function your posting describes.

On the analysis side of business analysis: in a concurrent research role I mapped an end-to-end monitoring workflow to find where handoffs slowed things down, authored the consolidated SOP the team ran on, and kept it current as requirements changed. I built Power BI dashboards from multi-source data and wrote briefing notes that put tradeoffs in front of senior management in plain language, and at IRCC I run Excel pivot analyses on large operational datasets daily. I am also completing the Google Data Analytics Professional Certificate to formalize and extend that toolkit.

Where I see myself helping the team: first, taking the recurring service and access workload off the team's senior people quickly, because provisioning, triage, and documentation discipline transfer on day one; then earning the analysis work, documenting processes as they actually run, flagging where they can be simplified or automated, and building the reporting that shows whether changes worked.

I should be candid that HR as a domain is new to me. My experience is federal operations, regulatory research, and three years of front-line team leadership at Rogers, where I onboarded and trained new hires myself, so I have lived the employee-lifecycle processes this role supports, just from the floor rather than the system side. I am in Ottawa, hold an active Reliability Status, and work in English and Arabic natively with working French, which I am actively improving. The Bank's bilingual environment is part of the appeal, not a hurdle.

Sincerely,

Husam Ahmed
