Re: Application for Business Analyst, HR Systems Support

Supporting the people who depend on a system is concrete work: someone cannot do their job until the access request, the permission change, or the broken process in front of them is resolved. At IRCC's Operations Support Centre I do that work daily for staff at over 60 Visa Application Centres and Missions worldwide, administering GCMS access and triaging a national intake of service requests against urgency and capacity, with every action logged. Your posting describes business analysis in support of HR systems and services. The systems would be new; the work would not.

On process analysis: in my concurrent research role I map an end-to-end monitoring workflow to find where handoffs slow things down, author the consolidated SOP the team actually runs on, and keep it current as requirements change. On reporting: I build Power BI dashboards from multi-source data and run Excel pivot analyses on large operational datasets, and I write briefing notes that put tradeoffs in front of senior management in plain language.

I should be candid that HR as a domain is new to me. My experience is federal operations, regulatory research, and three years of front-line team leadership at Rogers, where I onboarded and trained new hires myself, so I have lived the employee-lifecycle processes this role supports, just from the floor rather than the system side.

I am in Ottawa, hold an active Reliability Status, and work in English and Arabic natively with working French, which I am actively improving. The Bank's bilingual environment is part of the appeal.

Sincerely,

Husam Ahmed
