Re: Application for Fraud Operations, Countermeasures, Specialist

Fraud operations and my current casework share one core discipline: deciding quickly whether an identity is what it claims to be, and being right enough, consistently enough, that the queue keeps moving without letting bad cases through. At IRCC's Operations Support Centre I make those calls daily on a national intake, cross-referencing biographic, biometric, and travel-document evidence to resolve probabilistic identity matches, and escalating the anomalies that need controlled handling.

I should be candid: my title does not say fraud. The day-to-day does. Identity conflicts, duplicate records, document evidence that does not line up, and the judgment call between a false positive and a real problem are my caseload. Before IRCC, I spent three years as the on-floor KYC and credit decision authority at Rogers, where I also trained every new hire on verification procedure, so coaching a team to hold a compliance line is something I have done, not something I would be trying for the first time.

Two things I would add to a countermeasures team beyond the casework. First, I measure detection quality rather than assume it: in my concurrent research role I calculate percent agreement and false-positive rates between a real-time detection method and its benchmark, which is the same analytical shape as tuning fraud countermeasures. Second, I support operations across 60+ international sites and time zones, so high-volume, always-on environments are familiar.

I work in English and Arabic natively with working French, hold an active federal Reliability Status, and am based in Ottawa with flexibility for a hybrid Toronto arrangement.

Sincerely,

Husam Ahmed
